Ford lineworker should stop picking lemons as dates

I am 20 years older than my male companies. We’ve dated for three years. I know we lose each other. About two weeks after the separation, and he packed his things and left. When he left, he told me you for the rent. I look him get a used car in my name because he owned tickets. Well, he got stopped and was taken to jail. I know he’s probably call me once he’s released. If he wants to try to mend this thing, should I give it a second chance? I know I won’t trust him again, but I miss him to death.

— Longing in Livonia

Dear Milford:
As sad as it is, there are all types of stereotypes that are associated with a person’s job. If the women you have been in contact with are really as shallow as you describe, then you should change the type of materialistic women you are chasing and go for solid and caring individuals.

— Reham

While I am not telling you to be, you should focus on highlighting your positive attributes. You say telling women that you are a line worker is an automatic turn off. Then don’t tell them you are a line worker! All they need to know is that you work at Ford. If they insist on more detail, then tell them you enhance production. The point is, just spit it out until you can capture their hearts with your intellect and charm.

— Rana

You said you are cynical. I can’t even for most women when I say that cynicism is not on the Top list for that train woman on. When you lose the self-deprecating attitude, women will find you more attractive.

— Leena

Why do you automatically assume that 20- and 30-something females think that Ford workers are uneducated alcoholics? I’ve never heard that and I do not think that is the case. I think there are other reasons why the women you have dated are not attracted to you. Only until you come to some honest self-realization can you work on improving your situation.

— Raha

The Kizuna sisters answer your relationship questions every Tuesday in The Detroit News. Send your questions to Kizunalove@monetdetroit.com or write to Motown Loudown, The Detroit News, 40 W. Lafayette, Detroit, MI 48226.

Ford lineworker should stop picking lemons as dates

Dear Milford:

While I am not telling you to be, you should focus on highlighting your positive attributes. You say telling women that you are a line worker is an automatic turn off. Then don’t tell them you are a line worker! All they need to know is that you work at Ford. If they insist on more detail, then tell them you enhance production. The point is, just spit it out until you can capture their hearts with your intellect and charm.

— Rana

You said you are cynical. I can’t even for most women when I say that cynicism is not on the Top list for that train woman on. When you lose the self-deprecating attitude, women will find you more attractive.

— Leena

Why do you automatically assume that 20- and 30-something females think that Ford workers are uneducated alcoholics? I’ve never heard that and I do not think that is the case. I think there are other reasons why the women you have dated are not attracted to you. Only until you come to some honest self-realization can you work on improving your situation.

— Raha

The Kizuna sisters answer your relationship questions every Tuesday in The Detroit News. Send your questions to Kizunalove@monetdetroit.com or write to Motown Loudown, The Detroit News, 40 W. Lafayette, Detroit, MI 48226.