Wake up, Toronto – you’re bigger than you think

Richard Florida on his adopted city’s central role in a new world order built not around nations but around mega-regions

The cultural life is buzzing. … And yet everywhere we go we are met by Torontonians who seem mystified that we would move to what they imply is a second-rate city.’

‘The cultural life is buzzing. … And yet everywhere we go we are met by Torontonians who seem mystified that we would move to what they imply is a second-rate city.’

‘The cultural life is buzzing. … And yet everywhere we go we are met by Torontonians who seem mystified that we would move to what they imply is a second-rate city.’
It has a chance not only to redefine real estate, but to forge an inclusive and sustainable model of that ongoing change that has restructured the political process.

In fact, there is so much going on here that the city and its people are unaware of the wave of change that is sweeping through it. What has happened is that the region has created a very special and unique city, one of the most highly productive and economically dynamic areas in the world. It is perhaps the most important example of the future of cities and the future of the global economy.

A global city has become new reality and a world-class city with a world-class infrastructure. The city has begun to be recognized on the world stage, not only as a place where the arts flourish, but as a place where business is conducted.

For example, the city is home to one of the largest in the world, the arts and cultural district, with its internationally renowned museums, galleries, theaters, and concert halls. It is also home to some of the world's leading universities and research institutions, including the University of Toronto, which is one of the top 10 universities in the world. The city is also home to a number of major international companies, including BCE Inc., which is one of the world's largest telecommunications companies.

As the city continues to grow and change, it is important to remember that the future of the city is not just about the arts and business, but about the people who live and work here. The city is a place where people from all over the world come to study, work, and play. It is a place where people from different backgrounds can come together and share their experiences.

In short, the city is a place where people can come together to create something new, something that is truly unique and that will be a testament to the power of diversity and inclusiveness.